

Source: The New Zealand Spectator and Cook's Strait Guardian, May 27, 1846, p.3

We are sorry to state that Serjeant E. Ingram, who was wounded in the late attack on the camp at the Hutt, died of his wounds on Monday morning [25 May] at 4 a.m. He was buried yesterday with military honours in the Public Cemetery. The coffin, on top of which were placed the cap, sword, and sash of the deceased, was borne on the shoulders of four soldiers, and was preceded by the firing party with their arms reversed. Four serjeants supported the pall, and a company of the 58th regt. under Lieut. De Winton, and a party of the armed police, followed the body to the Cemetery. After the funeral service was concluded, three vollies were fired over the grave. The funeral service was impressively performed by the Rev. R. Cole.

Source: The New Zealand Spectator and Cook's Strait Guardian, December 9, 1846, p.3

A neat tablet has been placed in Wellington church, to the memory of Serjeant Ingram and the men of the 58th regt. who were killed while gallantly defending the camp on the Hutt from the attack of the rebels on the 8th May [sic - 16th May]. The tablet has been erected at the expense of Lieut. Page and their surviving comrades.